AIA Seattle Community Service Award goes to GGLO

GGLO will be presented the AIA Seattle Community Service Award at the 2011 Honors Dinner on May 21. The annual Honor Awards recognize “leadership and achievement in design and the built environment,” for architects and partners in other professions who make a difference through design.

Executive Director of AIA Seattle, Lisa Richmond, commented on the awards. “Good design makes a difference, but the architectural community can’t do it alone.” At GGLO, our mission of design for the human experience is enriched by partnering with clients, organizations and community members who inspire our work.

This is the first time that a firm has been recognized with the Community Service Award.

About GGLO

The buildings, neighborhoods, and communities where we live are vitally important to the well-being and development of us all. Through design, we can make the world a healthier, happier, and more productive place, and our desire to design for the human experience is infused in everything we do at GGLO. Accordingly, we're honored to have hosted non-profits and other groups in our office, creating a forum for idea-sharing and strengthening our common core values of community and sustainable urbanism. Located in downtown Seattle across the street from the Seattle Art Museum and above Harbor Steps, Space at the Steps continues to play host to discussions about creating places that benefit both people and the planet.

Enduring places grow from enduring relationships. GGLO is proud of the work that we do, and prouder still to be a good partner. Excellent design puts people first and at GGLO, we can happily say the same.
